Retired Circus Elephants

After years of very strong public objection, the Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus finally announced that their Asian elephant performers would retire in 2016. Though this decision was great news for animal lovers and activists, it raised a new issue. The huge animals like elephants or *rhinos that were (a) by human beings would not be able to survive in the wild. Now, thanks (b) *White Oak Conservation in Florida, the animals have a new home (c) they can walk around freely.

This conservation center is home to (1)around 400 animals including 35 endangered animals, such as rhinos, *cheetahs, *giraffes, and so on. The center welcomed the first group of retired circus elephants in May 2021. These 12 female elephants were between 8 and 38 years old.

To make their travel easier, they were made to live together for several months before being moved. (A) The others will join as soon as their new home is (2)ready.

The conservation center is modeled after the elephant's natural environment in the wild. The (3)various environments include forests, grass fields, and wetlands, and all of them are (d) for easy travel by foot. The animals can wander in the woods, relax in the mud, or swim in one of the eleven specially built water holes. The elephants can also spend their days relaxing inside the specially built *barns close (e) their human *caregivers.

"We are excited to give these elephants (g)a place to wander and explore," said the conservation center's owners Mark and Kimbra Walter. "We are working to (4)protect wild animals in their native environments. But for these elephants that can't return to the wild, we are (5)pleased to give them a place where they can live comfortably for the rest of their lives."

White Oak Conservation is not the only conservation center for retired circus elephants. *Elephant Refuge North America (ERNA) in Georgia recently welcomed Bo, a 34-year-old male elephant who spent 30 years working for the George Carden Circus. Bo is now living in a very large home with grass fields, woods, a pond, and a special elephant house. The area will be expanded to 100 acres once ERNA is able to raise enough money. The conservation center also is hoping to add nine more retired elephants to their facility.
